★ Unlimited data ★ Works with multiple Life Factor Packs ★ Simple to install and use ★ Windows Phone and iOS support ★ Download on iTunes app storeEfficacy and safety of lansoprazole in a 4-week treatment period in patients with high-risk gastric carcinoma. The safety and efficacy of lansoprazole (LPZ) for high-risk gastric carcinoma was determined in 20 patients with gastric carcinoma. The patients had been classified at high risk for recurrence based on a combination of histopathological findings and the staging results at surgery. LPZ 30 mg twice daily was administered for 4 weeks and the response to treatment was evaluated by endoscopic examination. Overall, 13 patients (65%) had good or excellent response to LPZ. Adverse events were observed in six patients. All were mild and reversible. No signs of systemic toxicity were observed. These results suggest that LPZ 30 mg twice daily is a useful and safe therapy in patients with high-risk gastric carcinoma.Q: How can I assign the value of a thread-local variable to another variable? From what I understand, using thread_local creates a new storage location for a variable per thread and then every thread has its own copy of the variable. So, in a program that looks like this: int main(void) { int thread_local_x; std::thread t(&OtherClass::do_something, &thread_local_x); int global_x; t.join(); return global_x; } Does the variable thread_local_x end up pointing to the same storage location as global_x? Or is the storage location per thread for thread_local_x always bound to it's thread somehow? A: That's a tricky question. The effect is that each thread has its own copy of global_x, so that the threads can access them separately. The storage location is per thread but not necessarily per thread-local copy. In short - use thread_local to create small amounts of storage for each thread. This will achieve O(1) storage cost, not O(n) and the space consumption will be in (usually) the order of a few bytes per thread, not in the order of gigabytes.
