To investigate the expression of Cyclooxygenase-2 (COX-2) in lung cancer and its clinical significance. The expression of COX-2 in 92 specimens of lung cancer was evaluated with the method of immunohistochemistry. The relation between the expression of COX-2 and the age, smoking history, histology, degree of differentiation, cell type and TNM staging of the lung cancer were analyzed. The positive expression of COX-2 was found in 39.6% (38/92) of the lung cancer tissue. The positive expression of COX-2 was higher in squamous cell carcinoma than in adenocarcinoma, the difference was significant ($\chi^2=5.3$, $P=0.02$). The positive expression of COX-2 was found to be closely correlated with the degree of differentiation of the lung cancer tissue, i.e. the positive expression of COX-2 was correlated with poor differentiation, $\chi^2=6.3$, $P=0.01$. The positive expression of COX-2 in the lung cancer tissue was not significantly correlated with the age, smoking history, histology, cell type or TNM staging of the lung cancer ($P > 0.05$). It was found that the expression of COX-2 was closely correlated with the degree of differentiation of the lung cancer tissue. The expression of COX-2 was not associated with age, smoking history, histology, cell type or TNM staging of the lung cancer. Investigation on the Effect of the Head Space Chemistry in a Packed-Bed Reactor for the Aqueous Phase-Supported Biocatalytic Reduction of Nitropyridine Schiff Bases to Pyridones. Nowadays, the core idea of the future sustainable human society and the protection of the global environment is the maintenance and optimization of resources by synthesizing biomaterials, like biologically derived catalysts, from renewable resources. In this work, we focus on the synthesis of pyridones by using solid catalysts that were immobilized in a packed-bed reactor by loading the enzymes directly in the support. Our goal
