.NET Creating a stock chart
library for ASP.NET pages

I'm trying to build a Stock Chart library for C#, and have been following this tutorial to create the charts. The problem is, that I can't seem to make it all work together in the same project. The project is starting fine and builds without errors.

But only after a while it does not anymore and I get these errors:

Error 1 The property

'XValue' is not a declared

property. Line: 51 Position:

public double XValue { get;

set; } Line 51 Error 2 The

property 'YValue' is not a declared property. Line: 51

Position: public double

YValue { get; set; } Line 51

When I navigate to the.aspx file directly, which does not use any of this functionality, it builds perfectly fine. Should I perhaps completely change the approach, and use Visual Studio 2010 Web Application templates, or are there better ways to create a stock chart library for projects? A: You have not converted the helper class to be the new project. When you build you need to use the same code from the original project that is creating the error. AET Systems, an application development and deployment platform supplier, has purchased 5,750 board-mount micro-controllers from Microchip Technology Incorporated (NASDAQ: MCHP) with a total purchase price of $3.1 million. The controller and related components will be used in AET's product line of contactless electronic identification systems. AET provides a complete set of software, hardware and solution-based services to develop and deploy high-reliability contactless and near-field radio frequency identification solutions. AET's solutions are based on robust, patented data-link technology that delivers advanced performance, high security, and broad interoperability. "From the outset we've been expanding our product offerings to offer proven products to our customers that are available at the lowest cost," said Jack Carman, president and CEO of AET Systems. "That has resulted in expanding our ordering patterns with Microchip. We have leveraged our expertise
