Investigation of the molecular and cellular composition of tissues is a key aspect of biological research and development of human diagnostics. Gene expression analysis and analysis of the cell surface composition are two examples of such approaches. The analysis of cellular phenotypes requires the detection and precise imaging of single cells in a heterogeneous cellular environment. Optical methods are restricted by low signal-to-noise ratios when working with such diluted samples and are typically associated with a large number of individual steps for sample preparation. Furthermore, the heterogeneity of the sample, e.g. cells at different stages of development or in different environments, leads to overlapping distributions of expressed features making unsupervised clustering difficult. Here we present an automated fluorescence microscopy method that allows for the direct quantification and comprehensive mapping of single cells. In contrast to cell surface microarrays we work

Saving a snapshot of the active window on the screen is often a smart idea. Save the layout of active window to the clipboard. The snapshot is saved in the directory you choose, and the default name is the snapshot's date and time. Capturing the whole screen makes it easy to use other applications in the background. Tired of the same desktop background? Just show your favorite one and let it capture! We released it on June, 29th, 2005 and it's Free for all users. It's still under development. If you found a bug, make sure to post it. Please include as much information as possible. Thank you. "AAA Screen Capture" is completely

Thank you. And here's the description I sent to AAC: AAC, You say: OK, then, I'm sorry I was wrong about that, you'll need to show more reasons as to why you think that a "standard" is actually "inherently flawed". Please elaborate. Thanks. AAC, Here are some screenshots from the game, but I'm afraid they don't accurately portray the many features on the screen. I hope this helps show you and I don't need to continue to argue over this. If it helps, I wrote up a little (incomplete) description of what to look for in a BBS, which you can read here: (not final, don't send me the link, just look for it). And here are some screenshots of the game:
