Somehow I have recently installed Codejock Xtreme Toolkit Pro V16 Full Source 90, along with the other Codejock software. Once I realised the name of this software was called codejock, I removed it from the list. At the time of writing I think it's version 10. Today I downloaded the product but when I tried to launch it it didn't work. After searching the internet for help I found this link. I'm sure if I had known about that link I would not have downloaded the software, but I did so now, so I'm hoping that maybe the problem lies there. My problem is that I have not installed any version of the software before the release date of v16, so how could it be that it should work after the latest version? I can't work it out, it's really annoying. Please if anyone can point me to a solution I would really be grateful. A: No, it's not because the new version is installed. The information the website claims, is that the installer software (and the installer itself) is signed by Codejock and currently only valid for Codejock products. But even though the new version is signed by Codejock, that does not automatically mean that the files within the installer are signed by Codejock (which they are if you install the new Codejock software). The installer is digitally signed and that does not mean that the files the installer uses are signed by Codejock (so not all Codejock software is installed with the same installation binaries). As you probably know, if you have not installed Codejock software from Codejock, you get a security dialog when trying to install software signed by Codejock that also gives a link to the Codejock website.
