I have tried this but it doesn't work. here is my code: `$('#submit').click(function(){ $.post('../js/form.php', $("#form").serialize(), function(value){ $('#returnedVal').val(value); }); });` Here is the form: 1 2 3 4 Why is my code not working? A: Change to `$('#form').submit(function(){ var value = $("#postman").val(); $.post('../js/form.php', $("#form").serialize(), function(value){ $('#returnedVal').val(value); }); });` There is no need to bind the.submit event to the form. You need only bind it to the #form selector itself. Also, if you're going to submit the data to a PHP page, it makes sense to send that data with 648931e174

The present invention relates to rotary engines, particularly for low-power use, and is more particularly concerned with high pressure steam engines. These engines are used to propel various machines such as construction machinery, agricultural vehicles, or the like. In general, machines of this kind have a drive unit, a combustion chamber attached to the drive unit, and a cylinder. The drive unit converts the rotating movement of the engine into a rotating movement of the cylinder which in turn is converted into an upward movement of a piston. The piston mechanically drives an output shaft connected to the device. In the case of small rotary engines, the combustion chamber is connected to the drive unit in rotation with the cylinder, and the combustion chamber is offset from the cylinder. These engines are commonly known as the "two-stroke" type. In the case of most current engines, the combustion chamber is located between the cylinder and the piston rod. These engines are known as the "four-stroke" type. A disadvantage of the rotary engine known from EP 0 526 858 is the mutual interference between the rotating combustion chamber and the piston. In some cases, the mutual interference is severe, rendering the engine inoperable. Furthermore, when operating in an atmosphere polluted by a component that is oxidized by the combustion process, the engine generates a noxious exhaust gas containing significant quantities of pollutants, in particular dioxins. Another disadvantage of known rotary engines is that the exhaust gas is generally at a lower pressure than the compression chamber, which reduces the efficiency of the engine.Q: If statement in function works but if statement in loop doesn't work properly?
