Colon carcinoma (CC) is the third leading cause of cancer-related death in western countries and the second leading cause of death in patients with cancer. Metastasis is the main cause of death in patients with CC. This study examines the ability of CC cells to recruit immune cells into the bone marrow, the primary site of metastatic spread, and the effect of cytokines secreted by these cells on their survival within the bone marrow. The murine colon carcinoma cell line CT26.WT was used as a model for metastatic CC. Bone marrow cells were analyzed for immune cell populations after incubation with CT26.WT cells. In addition, the effect of CT26.WT cells on immune cell recruitment was examined and determined to be a result of CCL19 chemokine production by the CT26.WT cells. Furthermore, the role of IL-1β, IL-6, or TNF-α in promoting the survival of CT26.WT cells was examined, as these cytokines have been previously implicated in regulating the survival of cancer cells. CT26.WT cells stimulate chemokine production by bone marrow cells. Furthermore, CT26.WT cells promote the recruitment of immune cells into the bone marrow. Finally, CT26.WT cells secrete IL-1β, IL-6, and TNF-α which promote their survival. These results suggest that chemokine production by CC cells in the bone marrow is an important part of their survival process.I learned somewhere that "if your doctor has not heard of it, you don't need it", however I am sure other people have developed such things. The object of this invention is to provide a process for treating refinery wastes, particularly from the hydrotreating of petroleum oils, which when carried out in multiple stages, results in high quality oils, preferably having outstanding properties for use in commercial use such as diesel fuel, gasoline and lube oil. The resulting oils have a very high flashpoint as is evidenced by the minimum flashpoint of 200xc2x0 F, and the maximum flashpoint of 550xc2x0 F, obtained in a single stage process. In the preferred process of this invention the overall yield of the process is enhanced by reducing the initial boiling point, for example, the boiling points of the Fischer-Tropsch products produced in the first stage is reduced by 1,000xc2x0 F, to a range of from about 2000xc2x0 F, to about 3000xc2x0 F, relative to the initial boiling point of the crude oil used as a feedstock. The Fischer-Tropsch products are divided into three fractionsxc2x094the wax, the olefins and the paraffins. This process is directed primarily to the conversion of the paraffins fraction of the Fischer-Tropsch products into lower boiling distillates. This is achieved by a process of extracting the wax fraction into a distillate, which typically requires the use of a solvent, and by hydrogenating the olefins in the presence of a catalyst to produce a mixture of hydrocarbons that are the basic feedstock for the process of this invention.A 31P nuclear magnetic resonance study of dihydropyridine-inhibited contractile activity in rat skeletal muscle.
