The expression of indoleamine 2,3-dioxygenase in melanoma correlates with tumor metastasis and patient survival. Melanoma is a highly aggressive malignancy in which biologic mechanisms associated with tumor progression and tumor immune escape are of increasing interest. One major mechanism of immune escape is the production of indoleamine 2,3-dioxygenase (IDO), a ubiquitous enzyme with a critical role in maintaining immunologic homeostasis. The clinical significance of IDO expression in melanoma, however, has not been thoroughly investigated. We studied the relationship between IDO expression, tumor stage, and patient outcome in biopsies from patients with localized, regional, and metastatic melanoma. Immunohistochemical analysis of a tissue microarray containing approximately 100 human melanoma samples showed a high incidence of IDO-positive cells in all stages of melanoma, with IDO positivity increasing during the metastatic process. The presence of IDO-positive cells correlated with survival for patients with regional and metastatic melanomas. In summary, IDO is a commonly expressed marker of melanoma. It correlates with survival for patients with regional and metastatic melanoma, but not for patients with localized melanoma. IDO is therefore a potential molecular target for immunotherapy.
