Microsoft FoxPro Tables To MS Access Converter Software Free Download is a software that was developed in order to allow Microsoft FoxPro users to easily transfer their tables to a Microsoft Access database environment. Inputting the required database files will not need any coding knowledge and all the functionality is based on providing database login credentials and directories. In order to be able to perform the file transfer, users need to add the containing directory which holds the DBF files. However, this task can also be achieved manually, by inputting a corresponding DBC file. This can be done using the built-in wizard, which will allow one to browse to the file location and select it. A connection test is provided and this will allow users to make sure that there is an established link between the loaded database data and the Microsoft Access database environment and that the transfer process can be carried out unhindered. The connection to the Access database is achieved by inputting the corresponding user credentials, such as the password. Provided that a successful connection has been established and that it is working after the test, once initialized, the transfer process will be accompanied by a status bar which is meant at notifying users about the progress of the transfer. Socio-cultural analysis and "theory-in-practice": the perspectives of an interviewer. This paper describes the development of a qualitative study which explores the effects of training on the ability of interviewers to construct social relationships. The study problem was approached through contrasting approaches in the methods of grounded theory and the philosophy of practice. The latter was used to analyse the socio-cultural determinants of interaction and the effects of 'contact' on the social scientist. Analysis is concerned with the capacity of the interviewer to obtain and encourage an expression of the subject's social world. It uses the concepts of "fit" and "trait" as a way of analysing the effectiveness of an approach to obtaining information. It is suggested that the latter process may be described as a socio-cultural conversion. This process is linked to the "power" paradigm of practice and to an understanding of the influences of gender, experience and training. It is argued that a theoretical approach to practice is possible, but that the formulations of the philosopher of practice are used within a socio-cultural framework. This is illustrated with regard to the study objective.
