OkTrack-laying machines, such as rock crusher machines, compact construction machines, and similar machines often have a track-laying module for a traveling carrier, e.g., a track-laying vehicle. The track-laying vehicle has a body that can be moved longitudinally along the track to be laid. The body includes a track runner with an engagement means for engaging a track on the ground. The engagement means have a track engagement receptacle that can be brought into engagement with the track. During operation of such track-laying machines, the track-laying vehicle travels in a sequence through a track area. In each area, a track is laid under the body of the track-laying vehicle. The body or the vehicle stays in the area until the next track area. This implies that the machine can be moved in the length of the track area in the track area. The track-laying vehicle is driven by wheels at the ends of the body. Due to the weight of the body and the load to be carried, the wheels are commonly powered using a hydraulic drive system. The driving of the wheels is generally synchronized to the depth of the engagement between the track-laying vehicle and the track so that the machine does not sink into the track. Tracks are laid for a variety of purposes. For example, tracks may be used as transport ways (e.g., for the transportation of wheel loaders, rock crushers, etc.). The tracks may also be used for the transportation of machine bodies or machines in general, e.g., for mining and similar purposes. Tracks are commonly laid by a track-laying vehicle and one or more machines for transporting the vehicle, e.g., using the machine as a pusher that keeps the vehicle in the track area. The track-laying vehicle may thus travel a relatively long distance with the machine(s) following, to be able to lay a relatively long track. Tracks are commonly laid by a track-laying vehicle and a plurality of machines. Generally, the machines are arranged in one or more lines, where each machine lays a track in one area. Commonly, the machines are arranged to each follow the same path, where the machines are arranged in a
