Language education in Australia Language education in Australia is in a state of rapid change. There is a strong focus on the teaching of the English language as a lingua franca which is used across the country. After English, however, there is a trend towards the development and teaching of specific regional and indigenous languages. Development In the 1980s, the position of regional languages in Australia was given prominence by the Australian Languages Action Plan, with funding made available to finance community language groups which allowed Australian Aboriginal language to be developed and studied in greater depth. More recently the National Australian Languages Strategy has been developed, supported by funding from the Australian Government's Commonwealth Development Research Program and the Department of Education. Australian Aboriginal languages Aboriginal languages The United States-based scholar Richard J. Wright (1964) first argued that two types of languages were spoken by Australian Aborigines: those associated with their tribal traditions, and those associated with their regional and social traditions. The first was well documented, whereas the second was much less well-documented and a significant hurdle to the study of Australia's Aboriginal languages. An example is Bakic. This language was historically spoken along the Gascoyne coast, which comprised the Arnhem Land and the Cape Range regions of Western Australia. It is thought to have been confined within the region as early as AD1100, with a significant extent of the language remaining until the late 19th century. Other regional languages such as Walmajarri, Nyangumene, and some Pama-Nyungan languages are also well documented, but it is accepted that their number is small, and their linguistic relationship to each other has yet to be established. In more recent times, the languages of the Torres Strait and Gulf region (including Yawuru, Kauraregudja, and Niatoputapu) have been increasingly recorded and researched. The number of speakers of these languages is also uncertain, but they are generally accepted to be members of the Pama-Nyungan language family. Australian Aboriginal languages differ greatly across the continent

It is also a problem in the elderly, and the prevalence of obesity in the elderly population is much higher than in the younger population. Obesity may be associated with a number of diseases, including diabetes, hypertension, cardiovascular disease, musculoskeletal disorders, osteoporosis and various cancers. Eating disorders affect approximately 2-10% of women. The most common eating disorder is anorexia nervosa, whereas the most common features of bulimia nervosa are eating binges and purging. Anorexia nervosa is associated with mortality. Other eating disorders are characterized by binge eating and/or purging. They are not associated with mortality and can lead to serious medical conditions in the long-term. This article reviews the medical aspects of diabetes, obesity and eating disorders in women, with a particular focus on the metabolic and cardiovascular disorders that are associated with the three disorders. Cobalt hydrogenation in nanoliter volumes (20 nL, 5 µL) by high-speed titration-based microscopy. The use of hydrogen as a universal transmetalation reagent is emerging as a powerful tool in solid-state bioinorganic chemistry. However, its application has been hampered by the lack of a facile method to locally generate high purity, molecular hydrogen on a pre-selected solid surface under ambient conditions. Here we show that titration, an inexpensive microscale technique, can be adapted for quantitative hydrogen production at the single crystal/aqueous interface. We demonstrate that the amount of hydrogen generated under ambient conditions in a nanoliter volume of aqueous solution can be quantitatively controlled and directly related to the hydrogen consumption of cobalt-carbonyl formation. Spatially localized, single crystal hydrogen generation was demonstrated on oxides, metals and semiconductor surfaces with total volumes of
