ATLANTA -- The U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service said Friday that it found no evidence of a link between the use of genetically modified (GM) crops and the decline of monarch butterflies, countering claims by a scientist who found strong links in a research paper published last month. Researchers who wrote last year that GM crops had declined monarch butterfly populations also had claimed that the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service (FWS) had not sufficiently looked into the subject. "We have not directly addressed the points that were made in the report," said Lisa Myers, an agency spokeswoman in Atlanta. She would not say who wrote the report. "We have not found evidence that monarch butterflies or their habitat are being negatively affected by the widespread planting of GM crops in the United States," Myers added. But Myers did comment on the paper's suggestion by U.S. entomologist Charles Benbrook that the butterfly's population has declined from 3.8 billion in 1980 to 2.8 billion in 2008. "I'm not in a position to comment on the specific numbers and trends that were reported in the paper. However, the FWS' monarch population has been stable for 25 years, which is a long time to be maintaining a 2.8-billion population," said Myers. Benbrook, an independent researcher who studies pest problems, released his study earlier this year with fellow author Lyle Borenstein of Lawrence Berkeley National Laboratory. Their paper, published in the journal Nature, stated that Bt corn, specifically developed to be resistant to Mexican bean weevil larvae, was largely responsible for the monarch's population decline because it reduces the insect's food source. On July 20, Myers told The Huffington Post in an email that the FWS first became aware of the paper and Benbrook's study in March, noting that the FWS routinely analyzes changes in monarch populations. "We review the relevant literature, and don't stop there, we also look at the 1cdb3666d
