I'm sorry for any wrong understanding. Posting a frequently asked questions here to get the attention of people who care about the topics, as well as a way of requesting clarification from people with more knowledge than me. It might be helpful to my understanding, as I lack subject knowledge in this topic. OK, I will try to explain more clearly why I posted a question here. If it is possible how do I know this? The other shells include ksh, mksh, zsh, bash, fish, tcsh, and pdksh. The command and script files that start a program are read by the shell before the program is executed. That means that the shell will perform language-specific processing and translation (such as translating from the Bourne shell syntax to the C shell syntax). Sometimes the operating system will modify the program as well. To send output to a pipe, the shell should invoke the command on the left side of the = character, redirect the results to the output file, and have the command read the results from the output file. In the case of the Bourne shell, the -c option enables the shell to perform further processing of the commands. In the case of the Korn shell, the -c option enables the shell to perform further processing of the commands. Yes, the Bourne shell takes that approach (the Korn shell is even more minimal, as explained in the linked Wikipedia article). With the example command in the question, the shell would have to translate each phrase into the desired form. For example, in
