In the past few years, several isolated studies have documented the reproductive capacity of the bee species Apis mellifera L. (Hymenoptera: Apidae). Hitherto, this is the only bee species in which advanced experimental investigations of reproductive biology and reproductive efficiency have been carried out. This paper summarizes the results of these investigations. In most studies, the reproductive biology of bees in a natural habitat was studied by observing the presence of the queens in the colonies, the number and the egg-laying capacity of the queens and the incubation period. Queen numbers and reproductive efficiency were found to be stable in two isolated colonies. The reproductive efficiency was low; only 7% of the eggs that could have been laid by the queens reached the adult stage. Compared to A. mellifera in the tropics, the eggs of A. mellifera in temperate regions are larger and the hatching rate is higher, but the reproductive efficiency is lower. This suggests that there are considerable differences in the survival rate of the eggs in the brood cells of tropical and temperate bees.
