Biventricular assist device and pulmonary arterial banding in the neonatal lamb. A pneumatic balloon aortic valvuloplasty was performed in five neonatal lambs on postnatal day 1 for the purpose of creating a model of left ventricular failure. After a 30-minute period of untreated left ventricular failure, five sheep received a ventricular assist device (Biomedicus No. 4). The device is a pulsatile left ventricular-right ventricular assist device driven by a pneumatic ballistocardiogram generated in the left ventricle. All five animals showed no significant increase in pulmonary blood flow. The ratio of the right ventricular to left ventricular output increased from 0.27 ± 0.06 before left ventricular failure to 0.61 ± 0.12 after left ventricular failure. Heart rate and blood pressure increased significantly after left ventricular failure. The time required for hemodynamic stabilization was approximately 3.5 +/- 0.5 minutes. The heart was then supported for 24 hours with the device. Left ventricular function improved significantly by pressure measurements of the left ventricular ejection fraction from a pre-support left ventricular ejection fraction of 0.57 +/- 0.04 to 0.91 +/- 0.10 and by the ejection fraction calculations from an end-diastolic volume of 11.8 +/- 1.1 ml/kg to 14.6 +/- 1.8 ml/kg after 24 hours of support. The post-support left ventricular end-diastolic volume was 16.5 +/- 1.6 ml/kg, and stroke volume increased significantly after 24 hours of support. These results suggest that this device may be useful in treating chronic and acute left ventricular failure in neonatal
