Globalisation and large-scale insecticide resistance are a threat to sustainable agriculture. In this context, the present paper deals with the identification of insecticide signal transduction pathways in model organism, Anopheles stephensi. Four signal transduction pathways (Gustatory Receptors (GRs), cGMP-Pathway, Insulin Signalling Pathways (ISPs) and cAMP Signalling Pathways (ASPs)) have been identified which act when treated with insecticides. AS is affected in response to insecticide treatment from 9 up to 25 µM concentrations in different time intervals. The present analysis also reveals the presence of active transporters, detoxifying enzymes, metabolising enzymes and target-site resistance mechanisms for insecticide activity. The insecticide resistance has been analysed by subtractive genomic library approach, which has been carried out on six different populations of A. stephensi. The study has been carried out on Anopheles gambiae as a reference for comparison of the resistance mechanism with the Indian species. The data collected reveal the activation of the different signal transduction pathways through appropriate expression patterns of molecular markers associated with insecticide resistance. The selected approach can be adopted for the identification of signal transduction pathways for the insecticide resistance in other insects.The present invention relates to an improved hinge mechanism for a sectional door and in particular to a pinless hinge. Many hinged doors, such as sectional doors, are secured by
