A collection of photos taken during UNEP's Global Earth Summit in Rio de Janeiro Now your turn! Explore While travelling through the world map of the game, players can scroll through a series of high-resolution photos taken during the event. These photos are one of the sources used to create the scenario as well as the characters and music. Each level can be played independently. When the player finishes a level, they will move on to the next. Using the included UNEP - Earth Summit Scenario Editor, players can design a new set of levels and use them on the same or a different device. By playing on a tablet or a phone, players will be able to experience the game's story through photos. The scenario is designed so that all the media used in the game is kept separate to support seamless transitions between levels. This allows for any new level to be played on the same device at any time and without the need to load the media. While playing the game, the player is tasked with traveling on foot to Rio. When ready, they will find the route described in the scenario using a number of available elevations, which are mapped out in the in-game map. The player will be tasked with working their way up to the summit, where they will be able to experience the Earth Summit in a uniquely personal way. The player's actions will affect the way the story plays out, and they may be able to influence the way the media is used by the real world agency. UNEP works around the clock, and the media provided in the game reflects the day that the game took place. The player can take actions to continue the story or look for additional information. Suppression of allergic inflammation in a mouse model of liver fibrosis. The rise in prevalence of allergic diseases, particularly asthma and atopic dermatitis, has been attributed to multiple factors, including changes in the immune system. The current study investigated the role of intestinal mast cells (iMCs) in allergic inflammation during progression of liver fibrosis. To examine the effects of long-term exposure to bile acids on iMCs, IgE-mediated allergic responses were induced in mice with long-term (5-week) exposure to cholic acid (CA). Inflammation and fibrosis in the liver were monitored after treatment with histamine and IL-4, respectively. IL-4 and histamine-mediated IgE production was enhanced in the sera of CA-treated mice, compared with

I recently took 20 flights. I am exhausted even after a short flight, but the latest episode just felt so wrong, so harrowing that I had to write it up. Enjoy, if you will, my broken film synopsis. (Note: If you are easily offended by overtly sexual humor, please do not read this.) Jack Walker (George Clooney) is an underappreciated airline pilot who has worked for the same company for 20 years. He lives alone in Chicago, and he hates his job. He desires to return to the land of his ancestors - England. His life becomes bedeviled when his 'friends' at the company scam him for a large promotion for "surplus employee assistance." Yee-Haw. This money is a chance for him to look after his mother, who is now suffering from cancer. He quits the company and moves his mother to France, where she dies after a few months. However, his woes are far from over. Loonshoot Smith (Julianne Moore) has obtained a huge block of shares of Aero-1. But she will only sell them to him for the same price he paid for his company - a million dollars. There is a catch: she will only accept Jack's personal cheque for one million and nothing more. She wants to cash it for the quick cash that she needs before all the excitement of an IPO. She is organized and puritanical. The plane cabin filled with personal dramas. The plane crashes. Jack crawls out of the wreckage, every inch of which is covered with blood. His life - and the rest of his fellow passengers' - is over. The camera pulls back slowly. Jack turns and looks at the dead and the dying. They all look back at him - people who had once been their friends. He is now a stranger to them. Jack - with his empty wallet and a lump of Coke-bottle glass in his leg - stumbles into the swirling darkness. He crosses the runway and exits through the Cessna's tiny window. He falls and hits his head on a propeller. The debris from the crippled plane has pinned him against the ground for some time, but now, he is dead. The scene changes. We see Jack in the hills of England. He is standing near a stream. He looks down and yells toward the water: 'Welcome to the Forbidden Zone.' The rocks and branches before
