The iPod touch on the other hand is a tablet, and it's pretty ordinary. So why hasn't the iPhone replaced the iPod touch? Apple didn't want to make iPhones with iPod touches. But does Intel's Atom processor fit the bill? It may. Intel is rumored to be working with Apple to create a new line of smartphones based on the chip. According to analyst Shaw Wu, "Depending on how the contract is drafted, Apple could license Intel's Atom for use in its smartphones." Wu wrote in a note to clients: "Intel is rumored to have made a case to Apple to embed Atom into iPhone for example by showing market opportunities of SoCs, particularly in PDAs, mobile phones, and tablets. Meanwhile, Apple may have indicated that there is a market opportunity to embed Atom in future iPads and Macs, and has made a case to Intel to license Atom technology for some of these devices, together with chips from other vendors. If true, this likely will be the final nail in the coffin for IBM's POWER series chips. While these are still ahead in performance, they don't offer the low power and relatively affordable solutions that Intel's Atom platform could deliver." The iPad's A4 processor is an Appledesigned chip based on a Power PC design, so what would you expect of a phone based on an Atom chip, and what would it bring to the table? Intel's decision to license the Atom design means that it doesn't control the Human papillomavirus and breast cancer risk in a case-control study of German women. Epidemiological studies have provided evidence of a strong association between human papillomavirus (HPV) infection and cervical cancer, but the evidence for breast cancer is limited. We examined the association between HPV infection and breast cancer risk in a hospital-based case-control study in Germany. HPV-DNA was measured by PCR in 69 breast cancer patients and in 196 controls. The odds ratio (OR) was calculated as a measure of HPV-DNA positivity in the breast cancer cases, as compared to controls. The odds ratio for HPV-DNA was 1.9 (95% CI 0.78-4.54, p = 0.16). The overall HPV-DNA prevalence in the controls was 12.3%. HPV-DNA positivity in the controls was lower in women aged > or = 50years than in younger women. Data from this case-control study did not provide evidence of a strong association between HPV infection and breast cancer risk in this population, which differs from the results of earlier studies. However, HPV-DNA positivity was found more frequently in controls than in previous studies.
