Posing of this sign by cardiovascular MRI (CMR) has been described as a marker for atrial remodeling \[[@CR1]\]. However, there are currently no studies of its use in predicting atrial fibrillation (AF). Objectives {#Sec2} ===== We aim to establish whether CMR-based assessment of the SCS is a useful marker for a history of AF. Methods {

I came across this part of it. int x = (int)100; int z = (int)100.0; First Question: Why is it doing this? What is the advantage of using double over int? If double is used to hold 100 it will overflow and store in memory and it will work just fine but int will just store 100 and won't overflow? I don't know what's the benefit of using int instead of double. Second Question: When we use that code which one will be evaluated first? int x = (int)100; int z = (int)100.0; printf("%d %d",x,z); Will it be evaluated this way int x = (int)100; int z = (int)100.0; printf("%d %d",x,
