JNS.org – A recently published study by Rice University's Kinder Institute for Urban Research examined the link between economic development and intermarriage in 30 U.S. cities. The study, "Research on the Black-White Intermarriage Gap: Occupational and Civic Income," suggested that a moderate to larger economic gap between blacks and whites can have a significant impact on intermarriage rates. However, according to the study's authors — longtime Rice professor of sociology Ralph A. Ross and Rice graduate student Daniel A. Martinez — it's not just income that affects intermarriage rates. "We found that being economically competitive has a tremendous impact," said Ross, noting that the results showed, in general, that higher income and employment rates have a much stronger effect on the number of intermarriages than educational attainment. Indeed, in four major cities in the Northeast — New York, Boston, Philadelphia and Newark, New Jersey — black-white intermarriage rates have hit historical lows. In all four cities, intermarriage rates have declined to less than 15 percent. Ross said that the Northeast's intermarriage drop is directly linked to the larger decline in economic disparity between blacks and whites. "The higher the income and employment rates for blacks, the lower the intermarriage rates," said Ross. "The decline in income and employment among black Americans has been dramatic in the Northeast and has also been dramatic in the South. Those trends seem to be related." Nationally, between 2009 and 2013, marriage rates for black women dropped by 2.9 percent and marriage rates for black men dropped by 3.7 percent, while marriage rates for white men and women rose by 1.6 percent and 1.8 percent, respectively. Ross said these changes in marriage rates can have a huge impact on many social issues — including crime rates. "If blacks get married they are much less likely to be involved in crime," he said. "Marriage can also strengthen family ties. Because of that, there is less violence among black men and their children." The study used 2011 data from the U.S. Census Bureau's American Community Survey. The data did not specify the racial background of the individuals and numbers were projected for the year 2013. 13 Cal.2d 283 (1939) BEATRICE TOLING, a
