Geotrack They can be of various sizes: small, which are used in tracking satellites, and large for military or emergency disaster use. GPS receivers use complex tracking loops to measure the time-of-flight between signals transmitted from a set of GPS satellites and the receiver. Many modern GPS receivers incorporate a microcomputer to perform many calculations and store data. GPS is essentially a system of satellite-based radio navigation using several types of atomic clocks on the satellites. Aircraft using GPS may measure range, bearing, and altitude of an aircraft's position, then use the data to guide them to fly a desired flight plan. A radar altimeter may be used to measure altitude, but radar altimeters are more expensive, less accurate, and require a continuous radar signal. Weather radar is sometimes combined with a GPS or satellite radio navigation system in order to provide timely warnings of areas with low clouds or bad weather, or areas in which distress messages have been transmitted. As is often the case, the first map with an accurate and complete set of topographical information for the United States was produced for the U.S. Geological Survey at about the same time the advent of General Radio started tracking aircraft with an in-cabin transceiver.-201, 1977.
