It's often used by designers to begin a project with the completed Web sites and mobile apps that are based on the same design. Disposable pads are used for a wide variety of purposes. For example, disposable pads are used for menstrual and/or fecal incontinence, for vaginal and/or rectal protection, and for similar functions. One type of such pad includes a fixed solid pad portion and a separate releasably attached liquid absorbing pad portion. The pad may also include an adhesive layer disposed between the pad portion and a non-adhesive layer. The non-adhesive layer helps to protect the pad portion from unintended removal from a skin surface. Furthermore, by protecting the pad portion, the non-adhesive layer helps to maintain the pad in a desired form. The non-adhesive layer may be a flexible non-adhesive polymeric film. Examples of such layers may be found in U.S. Pat. No. 5,888,408 (Barma et al.) and U.S. Pat. No. 5,405,528 (Varga et al.) incorporated herein by reference. U.S. Pat. No. 6,177,148 (DiPerna) incorporated herein by reference, describes a disposable sanitary product containing a non-adhesive polymeric foil. The foil is a non-woven material, such as a non-woven polyester or a non-woven polypropylene web, that is laminated to a non-adhesive polymeric film. The non-adhesive layer can be either separate from or a part of the pad portion. In either case, the non-adhesive layer can be configured to protect either the pad portion or the entire disposable pad. It is also possible that the pad portion could be completely unprotected in some areas such as its inner surfaces. U.S. Pat. No. 6,277,963 (Claeys) incorporated herein by reference, describes a reusable pad having a non-adhesive layer that could protect the pad from unintended removal and serve to maintain the pad in a desired form. The pad portion and the non-adhesive layer may be attached by an adhesive layer disposed between the pad portion and the non-adhesive layer. Non-adhesive layers can be materials that are non-tacky, i.e. material that does not have a tendency to stick to a material that comes in contact with the non-tacky layer. The non-adhesive layer can be made of polymeric material, a material containing water-dispersed gums and other

Q: how to call a method/function based on configuration in C# I have an app that has to be run with different configuration. The nature of the configuration is not always the same, and the default settings may be helpful for some configuration, but irrelevant for others. At the moment, I have to do something like the following code: private void Application_Startup(object sender, StartupEventArgs e) { if (ConfigurationManager.AppSettings["MyVal"] == "True") SomeFunction(); if (ConfigurationManager.AppSettings["MyVal"] == "False") SomeOtherFunction(); } and that seems ugly and prone to errors. Is there a more graceful way of doing this, perhaps using a provider like Castle.Windsor? A: This works for me, it checks a setting, and if true or false, it does the function: static void Main(string[] args) { bool set = ConfigurationManager.AppSettings["SomeKey"] == "True"? true : false; if (set) { GetValue(); } else { SetValue(); } Console.ReadKey(); } Gradually, it's becoming obvious that the Clintons are actually mostly retired and haven't been going back and forth to Little Rock to run the Empire the way their grubby little hands have always worked - and they're actually home, and just, like, chillin' at the end of the day. They're waiting for the time where Hillary was so over-the-hill that she's going to be irrelevant, then they'll resume their roles again and do it all their self-proclaimed way. However, in the meantime, I think they've been given quite the little gift, wouldn't you say? As pointed out by The Washington Post, there are some very, very little aspects to this former Chelsea Clinton presidency, some you may not have realized were existing - and in a VERY Clintonian way
