Fully cross-linked polymeric hydrogels are promising materials for applications ranging from biomedical materials, such as artificial blood vessels, to protective coatings for various products, such as fine chemicals, foods, and pharmaceuticals. The development of new cross-linked hydrogels and the evaluation of their utility are dependent on the ability to control the surface properties of the hydrogel. Previously, we developed internal gelation, fully cross-linked hydrogels by combining soft and hard segments. The polyacrylamide hydrogel obtained had various cross-linked structures due to this internal gelation. Here, we report a chemical reaction that generates surfaces and functional groups, such as carboxylic acid, on the hydrogel after water-soluble cross-linking. The chemical reaction generates carboxylic acid, which is the most frequently used functional group for nanoparticle coating, on the surfaces of the hydrogel. We found that microcapsule formation is best achieved with both hard and soft segment polymers to form a core-shell type of capsule. Furthermore, we found that a coating polymer should possess acid and alkaline groups so that it can be cross-linked with the hydrogel to form fully cross-linked hard shells. These polymers are also widely used in other fields. We expect that the concept described here can be applied to the development of other water-soluble, soft and hard polymer hydrogel surfaces.
