The Game LUNE has opened me up to a new world: the near-future, a world of VR. Virtual Reality is a remarkable medium that will force the human race to grow up and become designers, architects, and dreamers. In LUNE, we'll follow the fortunes of seven people who are the first to attempt to create and construct their dreams inside this new world. JJ has been a researcher in media arts for over a decade. During this time, he has designed and produced a number of virtual environments such as Journey to Babel and ArcadeSurgeon. LUNE is a venture for Cabbibo.tv, a non-profit organization that is inspired by the open source spirit from within the free and open source communities. Cabbibo.tv is a video production studio that produces VR experiences with the purpose of inspiring, educating and entertaining. The organization has been quietly working on LUNE since February. ### What's new in L U N E:

R S R E C E A R T S O N L Y S E C E V E L I wish to make a few remarks about the nature of normative concepts and the basis of normative judgment. These remarks are added to the essay I published in Philosophical Perspectives on "Values and Reasons", ed. Jacqueline Sullivan, Oxford University Press, 2000, pp. 149-154, here reprinted under the title "Critical Problems: The Limits of the Normative Right". I shall focus on a rather distinctive problem that arises in connection with the very notion of the "value" or "proportionality" of a state of affairs. For how can a state of affairs be more or less valuable, or less or more proportioned, than another, if they do not represent, however inadequately, that they themselves contain a morally valuable or proportional state of affairs? So, let us make clear at the outset what we are dealing with here and why. We are dealing with the notion that a state of affairs is "normative", that is, that it represents something to be the case in virtue of certain very general facts about it and its context. The key concept to consider here is the notion of representation. Representation is the notion through which we may draw a general first-order distinction between (a) states of affairs that contain an evaluative dimension in virtue of being "good," and (b) states of affairs that contain one in virtue of being "valuable" or "proportionate". Representation is a notion that allows us to make such a basic distinction. Now representation is a notion that is more than merely explanatory or constitutive of our concept of state of affairs. It is not enough, for example, to explain that representation is related to what some states of affairs represent. We must be able to explain why something is represented by a state of affairs. In this sense, to say that a state of affairs represents something is to say that it is a state of affairs that answers the question, Why is there something in this state of affairs? (This question could, of course, have been the question why a certain state of affairs had certain qualities of value, or proportion.) The question then arises: Could there not have been states of affairs that merely represent truths and values? Clearly, though we cannot claim to know that there could not have been a state of affairs that merely represented a certain proposition, or a particular value, we also cannot doubt that a state of affairs that represents X
