[Effect of epinephrine on hormone production in the ovary]. The aim of this work was to investigate the participation of adrenergic neurons in the control of ovarian hormone production. Experiments were conducted on mature male and female rats. We have shown that electrical stimulation of the cervical sympathetic trunk induces an increase in the content of LH, estradiol and progesterone in the hypophysis and in the lumen of the uterus. The most marked estrogen and progesterone increase was observed with the shortest stimulation period. The adrenergic neuron stimulator epinephrine did not induce any significant changes in the hormone production in the hypophysis and uterus. Diagnostic accuracy and prognostic value of the thresholding method for diagnostic tests with unreliable results. There is controversy over the value of the thresholding (or "cutoff") method for dichotomizing diagnostic tests with significant non-normality. This study investigates whether or not thresholding imparts information of diagnostic accuracy or long-term prognostic value. First, a simulation study is performed to develop a general probability model for thresholding the tests. Second, a data set with extreme non-normality is used to compare thresholding with the Wilcoxon rank sum test for diagnostic accuracy and with logistic regression for predicting survival. We perform 1000 Monte Carlo simulations of diagnostic accuracy and 1000 permutations of the Kaplan-Meier estimates. For the simulation of diagnostic accuracy, the proportion of correct and incorrect thresholding decisions is almost constant over the range of the non-normality parameter. For survival, more incorrect thresholding decisions are made in poor-prognosis categories. This indicates that thresholding is not informative about diagnostic accuracy, but it is informative about prognostic value. Although thresholding appears to have little impact on diagnostic accuracy, it may significantly affect its prognostic value.

Pioneer Press - June 28, 2010 A circuit court judge sentenced a St. Paul man to a minimum of five years in prison for threatening to kill his girlfriend in what police said was a rage-fueled attack. Prosecutors said in court Thursday that Michael Crowe, 26, shot his girlfriend in the arm and then fled the area after she called police. The woman's wounds, which were described as not life-threatening, were believed to have occurred early in June. Crowe was arrested about two weeks later. Crowe's girlfriend agreed to cooperate with investigators in hopes of having a record of the incident sealed, meaning that he wouldn't have to register as a sex offender. She testified Thursday that she and Crowe had been fighting, but that she broke things off at the couple's apartment because she was scared he was going to kill her. He told her "he was going to find me" and she believed he was a danger to her and their children. She said she feared he would go to prison for killing his ex-girlfriend, who was shot and killed by Crowe in 2006. In a subsequent taped interview with police, he said he and his girlfriend had been arguing but he didn't want to tell her what he did to her because he didn't want her to call the police. Crowe, who worked as a security guard at a drug store, pleaded guilty in June. His lawyer said in court that he suffered from mental illness and was not in control of himself at the time of the incident. Crowe admitted to shooting the woman, but said he was not aware that she had been transported to the hospital until later.

The day that political gamesmanship got ensnared with medical malpractice was a sad day for the entirety of Canadian politics, a cultural disaster for the incumbent Liberal Party and possibly the end of good doctors and the government that regulates them. We stand on the verge of the million mark — the number of medical errors in Canada that lead to death or severe injury, often for reasons that would now be easily and cheaply prevented if only medical students and resident physicians were properly trained in basic procedures. The number of deaths caused by medical malpractice in Canada rose by 74 per cent between 2003 and 2008, and the federal government's own numbers suggest that almost half of those may have been preventable.
