Field of the Invention This invention relates to the construction of a trailer axle, and more particularly to the construction of a semi-trailer axle whose flange contacts the wheel flange and which has a socket thereon that supports the underside of the axle to the bed of a truck or the like. 2. Description of the Related Art Trailer axles are well known and usually comprise a centrally disposed axle tube, a pair of kingpins, a constant velocity joint, a bottom plate, and an end flange that is welded to the side of the truck. The kingpins and the axle tube are disposed below the bottom plate which must be welded to the underside of the truck bed. It is highly desirable to weld the axle to the truck instead of using a nut and bolt arrangement to effect a connection between the axle and the truck. This is because the use of a nut and bolt arrangement makes it difficult to inspect the end of the axle to insure that it is properly aligned with the kingpins because of the necessity of disassembling the axle in order to get access to the end of the axle. The welding process makes it possible to inspect the end of the axle for proper alignment without having to disassemble the axle. The axle must, however, be properly aligned with the wheels. As the glycan profile of milk is known to vary with age, and the types of milk consumed are widely variable, lactose and N-glycan concentrations were adjusted to reflect the composition of the milk consumed during the study. Therefore, the concentrations of lactose and N-glycans in milk represent an estimate of what individual subjects would have received if they had consumed the milk during the study period. Using this approach, the concentrations of lactose and N-glycans in milk reported in this study would have been 0.93 and 2.53 g/L (1.46 and 3.27 g per 400 ml of milk), respectively.
