The inclusion of “HyperMotion Technology” was decided based on the game’s unique player models which take the top players of the sport and combine their movements to create a believable, dynamic character that moves and behaves like a real football player. “From our research on how to create an authentic-feeling soccer match, we came up with a plan to include player models made with 22 footballers from various continents, all creating a natural, believable experience in a one-on-one style of game,” said Andrew Salim, Head of FIFA at EA SPORTS. “We developed this technology in partnership with our engineering teams to enrich the players' movement and allow us to create authentic-feeling gameplay, and we're excited to show this technology first in FIFA 22." More control options, improved player models and more control improvements Multi-directional dribbling was introduced in FIFA 21 to help players outmaneuver defenders in tight spaces in the midfield. FIFA 22 adds more variety to this dribbling concept, offering players with quicker or slower feet the ability to dribble as they wish. Zonal coverage will now be more intelligently determined. Instead of simply deciding at a strategic point whether players should be 'in' or 'out' of a coverage, the new system will factor in many variables, such as the player's speed, acceleration and position on the field. The goal is to dynamically determine the type of play a player should be defending, allowing for a more varied and challenging defensive experience. Improved goalkeepers also make an appearance in FIFA 22. This is evidenced by players being able to build up speed through their kick, increasing the ability for close-range goals. FIFA 22 also adds the ability for goalkeepers to perform simple two-handed saves and being more aggressive in trying to recover the ball from clearances. Player dynamics are improved by adding new abilities. FIFA 21 introduced Player Impact Moments (PIM) that enhanced player reactions when being tackled or getting a red card. Players will now also be more dynamic, and can be more affected by anticipating passes. Players are also more accurate when performing dribbling runs, and can perform more intricate 1-on-1 moves. FIFA 22 also adds new tweaks to the off-ball and 'direct' (long-pass) controls. Off-ball controls previously had to be
