So what this suggests is that racism in the current system is not about inferior cultural traits but about marginalisation, exclusion and failure to integrate. It is about doing two things: making people feel different and hearing the story of how they relate to those differences. It is about control. It is not surprising that political parties are at their most racist when they are managing to do things they do not want to be seen to do. The racism that has been revealed in the Welfare Reform Act is not about insults to people's culture, but about exclusion, marginalisation and rejection. It is about a system that is holding people back, when it needs to be lifting them up.
