Thanks to the many discussions and emails I've had with Ben about this, we've arrived at a new - and hopefully foolproof - method of resolving the issue of jQuery in all browsers. What's changed from my original approach: rather than using t\his file to register the onDomReady event, I've instead used my own ready function to register the event, which I call onDomReady(). I've also added a flag called HANDLED_FROM_DOM to prevent overlapping events. The ready() function What's really strange is that I have been using this function for a few years now without incident. It was the standard way of registering events in JQuery long before they brought in the ready event. But in the past few weeks, not only have I been plagued with problems - one of which was getting this function to work on all browsers - I've also been experimenting with it on a variety of different web servers and the problem has returned. Here is the ready() function: (function() { var events = { click: 'onClick', dblclick: 'onDblClick', mousedown: 'onMouseDown', mouseup: 'onMouseUp', mouseout: 'onMouseOut' } If you used the onDomReady function from above, you would get the same results from the ready() function for browsers that didn't understand the onDomReady method and for browsers that didn't support it. But the ready() function has its quirks
