Nurses have many roles in patient care, including administering medications and care. But nurses also play a key role in delivering patient care safely and effectively. A 2016 survey of nearly 1,000 nurses found that 92 percent felt that nurses were the most important profession to improve patient safety in hospitals. Sixty-four percent of nurses surveyed said they had spoken up about a patient safety incident they believed should be reported. The good news is that just as nurses can play an important role in improving patient safety, hospital nurses can play a key role in improving their own profession. Part of this involves working in a safe, productive way. But while nurses often focus on patient care, they can also play a role in improving their own professional lives and helping the profession be better. Here are some ways for nurses to have a hand in their own safety. 1. Consider using patient safety training programs. While some individual hospitals have their own programs, the National Patient Safety Foundation has a free online program that hospitals or nurse training programs can use. It includes 1,418 safe care activities that include 7 to 10 simple interventions that can be easily implemented in most clinical settings to help achieve patient-safety goals," according to the foundation's website. The hospital on the CDW's Nursing Podcast, announced on May 21, 2017, that it is implementing Patient Safety 2.0, a database designed to create transparency and share patient
