Effect of shear on spheroidal mesenchymal cells. Spheroidal mesenchymal cells are frequently used in a number of biotechnological applications, including tissue engineering, drug delivery, and cancer therapy. The effects of shear stress on spheroid formation and contractility are the subject of numerous studies. In this study we used the Physio-Matic flow-based system to examine the response of spheroidal mesenchymal cells to laminar shear stress. We measured the effects of varying shear stress at rates ranging from 0.05 to 0.1 Hz on spheroid shape and growth. We also used enzymelinked immunosorbent assay to determine the effect of shear stress on the levels of cell signaling molecules found in the nucleus and cytoplasm. The results indicated that spheroidal mesenchymal cells showed higher contraction and elongation as the shear rate decreased. The cell signaling molecules, heat shock protein 27 (HSP27), SMAD2/3, nuclear factor of kappa light polypeptide gene enhancer in B-cells inhibitor, alpha (IkappaBalpha), and peroxisome proliferator-activated receptor gamma (PPARgamma) were found to be influenced by varying shear stress. These results are supported by the observation that a composite of the cell signaling molecules, polyhydroxylbutanoate, led to an increased resistance to the effects of shear stress.
