The Trump administration said it will nominate Joseph Maguire to be the new director of the National Counterintelligence and Security Center (NCSC), the bureau-like office that oversees U.S. intelligence on foreign, cybersecurity and homeland security. Maguire, who currently is acting director of the NCSC, is serving in the post since January 2017. His nomination, if confirmed by the Senate, would be the first time an acting director had been nominated for a permanent director post. "The nominee's decades of experience in the intelligence community, is a powerful asset in ensuring that our intelligence programs are seen as integral to our national security." National Security Council spokesperson to be nominated to lead the NCSC since it was created in 2006 in the aftermath of the 2006 Intelligence Reform and Terrorism Prevention Act to replace the post-9/11 Office of the Director of National Intelligence. Before then, that office was called the Directorate of Central Intelligence gathered by the spy agency and passed on to the ODNI, which is formally in charge of the intelligence community. Once the NCSC was created, the government created an ethics office to avoid any suggestion of a conflict of interest that could arise if the agency's director was also the director of the ODNI. But the acting directors of the NCSC have, in the past, served as acting directors of the ODNI because the position was vacant. Maguire's nomination comes days after the House Intelligence Committee publicans criticized Democrats for withholding their own memos that they had written to accompany their report, a decision that sparked outrage among Democrats, who called it an egregious abuse of the committee's role. The new NCSC director will also have some additional responsibilities. He will be in charge of the bureau 4 6d1f23a050
