First results of a prospective study]. Between January and June 1994, 52 patients were treated for primary hyperparathyroidism by radical nephrectomy. In most cases (n = 47) the diagnosis was confirmed by pathohistological examination of the specimen removed at surgery. For 11 of these patients, our approach was significantly modified because of the selective intraoperative sestamibi scanning. Preoperatively, 22 patients had osteodystrophy and 5 of them showed evidence of acute bone disease. In only one case was parathyroid adenoma recognized as incidental finding. The outcome of renal function and bone disease after a median follow up of 2.4 years was complete normalization of renal function (mineralization of osteodystrophic lesions) in 29 patients and partial improvement (mild hypercalcemia, bone lesions partially corrected) in another 9 patients. Recurrence of PTH secretion was observed in 3 patients. In 2 cases, persistent PTH secretion led to discover other causes of hyperparathyroidism (sarcoidosis in one case, and drug overdose in the other one). In one patient, an ectopic adenoma was discovered at a remote site (colon) and these patients were treated by adenomectomy. Overall, a 70% success rate of the treatment was obtained. The 4 patients who underwent reoperation had a comparable outcome. I'd say they're developed as well as they can be. I mean, yes, you want to preserve the design elements of Lego bricks, but there are a lot of other things that go into creating a Lego set that you can't do on an MOC: finding the right pieces, the best way to attach them, the color and material of the pieces, etc. Things that are not dictated by the design of the bricks themselves. But still, there's other ways to extend them a bit beyond the LEGO way. I've never made a figure from a LEGO set, but I think it'd be a fun addition for a more "practical" MOC. Lett.
