However, as an American author, you are providing more of a service to the Englishspeaking world than a European is, in my mind. You have to be clear on where you are, where you're going, and how you want to come there, and that is very specific to what an American author does. The Europeans like to fly in the face of expectations, but here in the States we fly to meet them. That's why I think most of the big names in publishing are American because we put our noses down a lot harder and end up meeting those expectations. There are many wonderful British authors that I would love to publish, but it's going to happen when they want to publish with an American house. They're definitely not going to jump to a British house first. I think that's one of the things Americans do better, to put their noses down and march ahead, whether it's an American or an English author. That's why I think most of the big names in publishing are American. They move guicker, they make faster decisions, and they're not waiting to see how it plays in England. They're just not waiting for Europe to do it. They're going to do it themselves. Their whole publishing model is unique to the English-speaking world, whereas publishing in Germany or France or whatever is all about service to the customer and not necessarily about driving the customer to an end product. The present invention relates to the field of network management, and more specifically, to routing and access control in a network. In computer networks, network service providers have made strides in installing, maintaining and providing service to a network. In the past, routing and access control information was typically disseminated from a central network manager to the network service provider through manual changes in the routing and access control tables. Because of the size and complexity of some networks, however, central network managers typically make multiple manual changes to the tables. Accordingly, a need exists for network management which allows distributed network service providers to remotely manage their networks without manual interaction. Prior distributed network management systems typically allowed only certain network segments to be managed. However, a need exists for distributed network management which allows multiple segments of the network to be managed. The present disclosure relates generally to power conversion and distribution systems, and more particularly, to a method and system for providing power to portable electronic devices and vehicles. A conventional power source system may include
