obscure, head over to Invisible Cities, the online venue for late-breaking news. The original meaning behind the term “rock block” was rooted in the “rocker” from the 60s. Since then, the term has evolved to describe a technique used to create “blocks” in the material of a guitar, bass, or keyboard instrument. Each block uses a series of strings attached to a platform mounted to an instrument body for changing pitch. Guitar strings are generally used, but a variety of other alternatives are used. For example, when building a guitar or bass, the strings are tied to a platform or frame where a player can place the “blocked” strings in different configurations. Different types of blocks for guitars have been developed in the past, such as the Showoff Drive (U.S. Pat. No. 4,069,935), the Parada (U.S. Pat. No. 6,206,895), the Block T (U.S. Pat. No. 5,540,489) and the Virro Cycle (U.S. Pat. No. 5,738,102). However, all the existing blocks are basically comprised of a string-receiving plucking surface, and a pivoting mechanism for bringing the plucking surface into contact with the strings. Although the existing blocks are generally useful in terms of their functionality and the facilities provided to the player, there is a need in the prior art to design a more effective musical instrument. This is particularly necessary for creating a different timbral sound for the existing blocks, since each block is essentially the same and provides the same functionality. The instrument may be designed to provide a longer string length or a greater neck length, allowing for more articulation, more finger-rolling or note bending, and so on. As a result, the instrument may be more suited for larger scale performances, or for more versatile styles of music. The instrument may also have more elaborate and innovative construction techniques or features, such as a customized neck shape or playing articulation, different fretboard designs, or various types of tonal effects. In a similar manner, the 6d1f23a050
