You have a bunch of "bad" HTTP requests in the "Request" section, and it's normal for the browser to delete them when it cleans up. I would view that as a sign that your browser is doing its job and as a hint to that your computer/browser is clean. Perception of the low risk of Parkinson disease in relatives and among the general population. An accurate perception of the risk of Parkinson disease (PD) may influence help-seeking behaviors. Therefore, the risk perception of individuals with PD and their relatives was examined as well as the knowledge of the general population in cases of PD. A written anonymous survey was sent to all patients with PD (n = 209), and a random sample of the general population (n = 1,700) in southeastern Sweden. For both groups, the PD patients and relatives of PD patients were equally likely to believe they have a low risk of developing the disease, while the general population was almost six times more likely to believe they have a low risk of developing PD than individuals with PD or a relative of a PD patient (39% vs. 7% and 10%, respectively). Most individuals correctly responded as to the gender distribution of PD: 71% to the general population, 59% to PD patients, and 53% to relatives of patients. The majority of individuals were unable to correctly identify the person in the movie that initiated the public-health campaign. Approximately 10% of all individuals who have read or heard about the campaign believe that the chance to get PD is high. Our findings suggest that the public is not correctly informed regarding the risk of developing PD and that there is a demand to further inform the public about PD. In vitro culture of single cells from apical papillae. The differentiation of cells from an epithelial population is a common occurrence during fetal and postnatal development. It is important to understand this process in order to obtain sufficient material from each individual of a sample group. In this paper the differentiation of rabbit oral ectomesenchymal cells in culture is
