This study investigates the effect of two pricing structures on customers' purchased decisions, i.e. the value-added service package on condition of a fixed subscription fee and a fixed price for the subscription per year. To ensure consistency of pricing over time, both pricing structures must be revised every year. In this study, we assume that the availability of alternative services is high, the fixed subscription fee for services is low, and customers face various types of uncertainty. An empirical framework for analyzing customer responses is introduced. The results are then compared to the findings of analogous studies in two areas of literature. Most of the results show that only price differentiation increases customer demand for subscription per year and the customer loyalty to value-added services, whereas the structured pricing does not. Thus, free trials appear to be the optimal pricing method for long-term contracts. If free trials are not available, the structured pricing might be a reasonable alternative. This research focuses on the role of supporting decision-making in the purchase of vehicle service parts by analyzing the influence of different information and context factors. The supporting factors are impact of increasing cost, impact of increasing income, behavior of substitute utility, and cooperation of the decision-makers. The main goal is to find out which information and context factors support and determine the purchase of vehicle service parts. The relationship of the factors is analyzed in order to support decision-making in the purchase of vehicle service parts. The study is based on a questionnaire. A total of 127 students participated in this study. The results show that support for decision-making in the purchase of vehicle service parts depends on the impact of increasing cost and impact of increasing income, the behavior of substitute utility, and the cooperation of decision-makers.
