One person was kind enough to explain to me how to do this. Short story long, I edited the log format of the file using vim and then added the following to the end of the file: ^T /UserID:%5c /LogonId:%5c /Subject:%5c /Event-ID:%5c /Message:%5c /TimeStamp:%5c /EventType:%5c /Level:%5c /Facility:%5c /MachineName:%5c /ProcessID:%5c /ProcessName:%5c /ProcessImage:%5c /PID:%5c /ServicePack:%5c /ServicePackMajorVersion:%5c /ServicePackMinorVersion:%5c /ServicePackBuild:%5c /Win32ExitCode:%5c /Format%5c=%5c To get started, let me share with you one particular scenario - and an analysis on what you can learn from this. A small company has deployed Microsoft SQL server 2016, Windows 10, and Apache web server on its standard Windows desktop and laptop computers. One of the employees (Windows user) has been able to access the Apache servers using his Microsoft account on the desktop computer. He used the Windows 10 version of the Program -Windows - Internet -Connect to.. command (in the list of apps). The employee used his Microsoft account to connect to the ServerName. He had added the ServerName directives as follows: The Log Viewer works by collecting a list of your Apache log files. The user need not provide a config file. It analyzes the current Apache log file and then looks for other files. The user can select what Apache log files to use, and also add additional items to watch. If the user wants to watch Apache by.php or.html files, for example, the user can select that. This feature is not a substitute for more advanced logging, but rather an easy way to view your logs. 5ec8ef588b
