Globefreeloadgenerator

For generating load results with a net result of zero current, you need a zero resistance test load. In the past, you could use a standard resistor, but these generate a lot of heat that could damage your simulation, thus they are now being replaced by zero resistance loads. These can be produced by means of the globefreeloadgenerator class. To use it simply add it to your load simulation like this: `myVariable.setLoadProfile(new Globefreeloadgenerator(0.1, 100, "=", 5));` The first parameter is the percentage of the full value you want the load to be in the simulation. The second one is the full value you want this load to go to. If you want the load to remain in the simulation for the entire simulation you should set it to 100. The third one is the load type, either "=", ">", "" depending on what you want the load to do. In all cases the load will decrease to the minimum value if the current goes to positive values and increase to the maximum value if the current goes to negative values. In the case of an = the load will move to that value when the current is zero. The globefreeloadgenerator executable generates the common script that performs an XHR request to the globefree.js service every time the page is refreshed. this tool generates a new globals.json file based on the contents of the globals.json file. examples generate the globals.json file for the global variables from the globals. % globefreeloadgenerator globals.json generate the globals. % globefreeloadgenerator --filename globals. generate the globals.json file and output to the standard output.json -o output. exit codes exit_ok command completed successfully. exit_failure an error occurred while processing the command. see also globals-json 5ec8ef588b
