This method will only work if you're installing Windows 10 into a VM. Unfortunately, Windows 10 appears to be particularly sensitive to VirtualBox configuration issues, so this setup is a lot trickier. It's probably do-able, but only if you have experience with VBox. This method will only work if you're installing Windows 10 into a VM.

Unfortunately, Windows 10 appears to be particularly sensitive to VirtualBox configuration issues, so this setup is a lot trickier. After rebooting, the Windows XP Product Activation window will appear and the Windows XP product key is automatically entered into the Windows Activation Wizard GUI. Note that the product key will be changed so this is the actual product key. The second method, using the Windows Management Instrumentation (WMI) script, is useful if you want to change the Windows XP product key without having to use a graphical Windows interface. After the procedure has been completed, your new Windows XP product key will appear. The Windows Activation Wizard is also very similar in appearance to the Windows Setup Wizard. For an additional fee (installation and activation can be purchased separately), your Install and Activation package will be upgraded to include a license activation. There are more basic changes for Windows XP SP2 that can be installed, such as removing support for Windows XP SP1. However, if the product key changes, Windows XP SP2 will fail to install. With the Windows Activation Wizard, select Tools and then click Change Windows key. A dialog box will appear, where you need to enter the Windows XP product key that was automatically entered during installation. Select Proceed and follow the Windows Setup Wizard dialog box.
