divergent boundaries (figure 10.18) are formed when two convergent plates pull apart. as they pull apart, the crust becomes thinner. in most of the world, the thickest crust occurs at convergent boundaries, and as the crust becomes thinner, it becomes weaker and more brittle. this weakening of the crust leads to the formation of faults in the crust, and the weakening of the crust results in the formation of the many thin, crustal-scale, mid-ocean ridges and spreading centers (figure 10.23). the most dangerous, destructive, and well-known plate boundary in the world is the san andreas fault (figure 10.20). the san andreas fault is a transform boundary where the pacific plate is subducting beneath north america. the san andreas fault crosses a significant amount of california, from san francisco to bakersfield, but it also runs through the southern part of the state. the san andreas fault was discovered by john francis harper in 1833 while he was working at the pacific railroad survey, which was a survey sponsored by the government to mark the boundaries of the united states. the san andreas fault has a right-lateral strike slip movement, as opposed to the left-lateral strike slip movement of many other faults. the san andreas fault is so important that the entire california coastline, as well as a significant part of the san francisco bay area and all of the san joaquin valley, lie on the left side of the fault. the san andreas fault is the site of the extinct volcanoes seen in figure 10.21. the development of the san andreas fault and the related volcanoes caused the san francisco bay area to be built on a series of basaltic volcanic islands. the largest of these islands is mariposa island, which is home to the mariposa national grove of big trees.
