personally, cameron was known for his dictatorial style, hot temper and obsession with detail. for his reenactment of the historic ships sinking, the films crew constructed a 775-foot (90 percent scale) replica of the rms titanic and put it in a tank containing 17 million gallons of water. production was done in mexico, and members of the cast and crew later complained about the harsh conditions, including shooting days of more than 20 hours, much of that time spent standing in cold, murky pacific ocean water. the second study, by british historian tim maltin, claimed that atmospheric conditions on the night of the disaster might have caused a phenomenon called super refraction. this bending of light could have created mirages, or optical illusions, that prevented the titanics lookouts from seeing the iceberg clearly. titanics designers and builders were aware that theres a huge risk that the ship would break apart on impact. to minimize this danger, the ship was built of steel, which is fairly strong and is resistant to being crushed under the weight of water. but steel also has a weakness: it can split apart when stressed. in the case of the titanic, that stress was provided by the iceberg that had its sharp end jutting into the ship, causing it to go under. the ship moved at a speed of about 11 knots, meaning it was going almost twice as fast as a typical passenger ship would travel. when the titanic collided with the iceberg, the water was forced into the ship at a rate of over 3,000 gallons per second, further stressing the hull and causing it to buckle.

the film spawned a sequel, titanic ii: resurrection, which was released the following year in 1998. while not as successful financially, it enjoyed more favorable reviews and critical acclaim. critics were also impressed with its technical achievements, especially the movie's stop-motion animation sequence, which gave the film a realistic look. however, cameron had already decided that he would make a third titanic movie, the story of which he outlined for rolling stone and which would later be published as a book. titanic iii: from the ashes opens in 2005. cameron is a strong believer in the law of attraction. when you think about it, it makes perfect sense. when you make something, you put energy into it, and that energy attracts more energy. you attract more people, more money, more opportunities. the more you think about something, the more you talk about it, the more you are going to attract. so if you think of yourself as a director, then you will attract people who are interested in the world of film, and you will attract good directors. if you think of yourself as an architect, then you will attract the kind of people who are interested in architecture. if you think of yourself as a writer, then you will attract people who are interested in writing, and all these different people will come together and make a movie called titanic. cameron wrote the screenplay himself, and it was co-written with george f. walker jr. of 10th avenue productions. the script was originally known as underwater, and then became titanic. the original title was never used for the final version of the script because cameron felt it was too derivative of the james cameron/james cameron 1991 documentary underwater. 5ec8ef588b
