A federal appeals court on Wednesday agreed to hear a case that claims New Jersey's ban on assault weapons and high-capacity magazines violates the Constitution. The New Jersey State Rifle and Pistol Association filed the lawsuit against the state last year after it enacted legislation that limited the sale, possession and use of semiautomatic weapons and large-capacity magazines. The association is challenging a law that allowed existing owners of such weapons and magazines to keep them if they registered them, but forbids them to sell them to anyone else. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit heard oral arguments Wednesday in the case, and the court is expected to rule within six months. "We would hope that the court ultimately will see that these are lawful, effective gun control measures," said Christopher Loder, executive director of the association, in a statement. In April, the court issued a decision in a case that challenged a nearly identical ban in Connecticut. In that case, the court struck down a law that banned the sale of certain types of firearms, ammunition and magazines. "I think that the position is well taken," said District Judge Juan Torruella at the time of the ruling, who was appointed to the bench by President Bill Clinton. "The burden on the Second Amendment is not that great because the government has a legitimate interest in public safety and the protection of its citizens." However, Torruella added that he agreed with the Connecticut ruling "that the government cannot have the ability to subjectively decide what types of weapons are most appropriate for its citizens, and what firearms and magazines can be sold or purchased in the state of Connecticut." New Jersey enacted its law in 2013, and the association has claimed that it is a challenge to the Second Amendment of the U.S. Constitution. The suit also claims the law violates the Equal Protection Clause of the U.S. Constitution because the law was crafted to protect the interests of gun manufacturers. "We will continue to defend Second Amendment rights to this end," said Jim Re, the association's general counsel, in a statement.
