95ec0d2f82 Vinylmaster downloads, Magneto-electronic devices, spin electronic devices, and spintronic devices are synonymous terms for devices that make use of effects predominantly caused by electron spin. Magneto-electronics are used in numerous information devices, including but not limited to, data storage, memory, and logic. Transition metal oxides have recently been investigated for use as metal oxide semiconductor (MOS) devices in devices incorporating two or more magnetic materials. Such devices may be used in nonvolatile memory devices. Each magnetic material may have a magnetization direction that may be either parallel or antiparallel to the magnetization direction of the other magnetic material to form either a parallel or antiparallel magnetization arrangement. For example, WO 2006/119784 discloses manufacture of nonvolatile magnetoresistive elements from a plurality of magnetic thin films. The elements have an additional nonmagnetic gap layer adjacent to a series of magnetic material and nonmagnetic material layers. The additional layer may allow for formation of a tunnel barrier in the device. For example, for the case of such devices having an antiparallel magnetization arrangement, an electrical current is passed through two or more magnetic material layers with the current flowing perpendicular to the plane of the film or parallel to the plane of the film but in a direction that is between the current flow directions of the two antiparallel magnetization arrangements. For the case of such devices having a parallel magnetization arrangement, an electrical current is passed through two or more magnetic material layers with the current flowing parallel to the plane of the film or perpendicular to the plane of the film but in a direction opposite from the current flow direction of the parallel arrangement. The magnetic material layers include magnetic CoFeB layers and magnetic NiFe layers. In forming the layers, the magnetic layers may be epitaxially grown on a base layer. The base layer may include at least one of a NiFe and a CoFeB layer. However, these and other approaches are limited by on-state resistance of the device. It is desirable to have semiconductor devices with lower on-state resistance and higher cell stability
