I think the new features in Lightroom 5 are interesting, but I still think the key to the software's future is to reduce the number of image processing steps that you have to do in order to process your images. There are still many modern photographers who think of Lightroom as a product that helps you import your images, insert watermark, edit them and face your images in full resolution. The truth is that the Lightroom developers have already done their best to make Lightroom more manageable. Natural Lightroom was and still is (or I should say, Natural Lightroom was and still is) probably the best Lightroom. There is no doubt that there are still a lot of people who love Lightroom and who's workflow and workflow is dependent on Lightroom. However, the more the camera manufacturers try to have their products integrated with a couple of software programs, the more people are going to end up moving away from the programs to programs like Photoshop. Adobe's approach to consumer's desires has also simply hardened their refusal to make rudimentary changes to the products. This is quite understandable when sales figures are so strong for the suite. But, as a fellow photography enthusiast, I also feel that if Photoshop is failing to differentiate itself from other software in a market where competition is already fierce, then that's a problem.
