In fact, he has not released any financial disclosure forms since becoming president. And neither has the president-elect. Back in April, The Washington Post reported that in the weeks before the election, Trump had at least five financial advisers, whom the paper identified, "increasingly alarmed at his chaotic financial management." In October, The Wall Street Journal reported that Trump's tax returns show little income from his businesses and the real estate empire he built and left to his sons. Trump promised voters during the campaign he would be open and transparent in terms of his finances, and he has been criticized for not doing so. Trump lost the popular vote to Hillary Clinton, but crucially, the electoral college. States like Michigan and Pennsylvania had been viewed as battlegrounds, and while Clinton won those states by razor-thin margins, it was enough to offset losses elsewhere and give her a total victory. According to the National Committee for Popular Democracy, which tracks vote counts, that makes Trump "the first person in American history to take the White House without winning a majority of votes in the Electoral College." "If Donald Trump is elected president, he will be the first president of the United States who has never won a majority of votes in any level of government," said Derrick Cro
