For the most part, the app performs reasonably well. In general, I think the iPad Pro and most of its apps work best when I have a heavy-duty paper or pad nearby for holding the device and scribbling while I navigate. It's rare that I'll plan a shot on-the-go, and the $199.99 price tag on this title is very fair, though it isn't at all inexpensive. When you're scrolling through the photos in a slide show, you'll notice that there is no support for slideshows. Neither is there the ability to control the play speed, pause, fast-forward or rewind. This perhaps makes sense, given the fact that Adobe uses adaptive stream technology. However, I found it a little weird that a feature so significant was removed. Such decisions, even more so than those made by Google in the past, make it seem like key features and capabilities are being lost in the shuffle of releasing a working product. While I enjoy this app and don't have as many qualms about it as I do with the other apps in this roundup, I still have an issue with how things are organized. To make a long story short, what would've been a great feature for me (dividing images into lanes) is not supported. It's annoying. To me, the best part of "Adobe Photoshop" is being able to edit photos. I'd rather have everything I need in a single place, so I can focus on that. The S-Pen is still adjusted in Photoshop for drawing but I'd be curious to see some third-party alternatives. I know that Google isn't the only company to try and make a stylus more than a drawing device, but the idea of making an iPad into a stylus device makes sense, especially with this Apple Pencil.

A layer mask is either solid black or transparent, allowing you to delineate and visualize what you're working on. An image without layer masks is full of confusion. So make it simple and straightforward with an effective layer mask. If you know where you want the effect to be on a new layer, you can simply click the layer and drag the selection towards the direction you want. If you work on a large canvas or have to make adjustments to too many layers, there are some streamlined shortcuts. For instance, I've pinned (select some pixels) and unpinned (clear the selection) an area.
